Principal's Report

Wilson McCaskill Corner - Strong and Safe Classrooms

Children who pin their happiness on having good relationships and friends are at less risk of depression. Friends reinforce our sense of self-worth. We matter to our friends because of who we are not because of what we do or do not achieve. Friendship is a virtues based relationship not dependent upon outcomes. Nothing has to be achieved in a friendship. From the process of being friends comes the pleasure - the process reinforces the friendship and maintains the pleasure. Goals are exciting. They create purpose and challenge and their attainment can generate overwhelming momentary happiness. Not to reach a goal can leave you feeling like a failure. To make happiness dependent upon goals is to put it out of reach. To give our children the social skills to make strong and lasting networks of friends is to protect them from depression.
